

Title of project

Assessing business efforts to reduce child and adolescent labour in developing countries: the case of adolescent girls in India's cotton garment industry

This research project seeks to better understand how community-level institutions – both public institutions (State and local government) and private business institutions – affect adolescent girls working in the global cotton value chain. The focus is on the start of the value chain, from the farming and ginning of cotton, to the spinning, weaving/knitting of yarn to make textile/fabric. We hypothesize that the policies, practices and codes of conduct that business enterprises use to manage risks related to human resources and employment can improve working conditions and influence a reduction in harm among adolescent labour, and government institutions can moderate the strength of that relationship. For these reasons, we are interested in understanding how to measure the effect of business employment practices on child labour and adolescent labour risks with a special focus on adolescent girls so that this is most meaningful for workers, firms/organizations and at the community-level. The research is comparative and examines community-level institutions in two parts of India (Andhra Pradesh/Telangana and Gujarat). The research is policy relevant and will lead to better knowledge on how to improve community-level institutions.

The business enterprises that we will look at include business enterprises with or without certification, including companies, producer organizations, Fairtrade bodies and other cotton value chain actors (i.e., cotton producers, ginners, traders, textile manufacturers) and industry auditing firms. This research will engage the perspectives of other stakeholders, including government representatives responsible for labour, employment and child protection including the inspectorate; worker representatives including trade unions and informal worker groups, and other social actors particularly non-governmental organizations.

This research takes place over four months. In August or early in September, questionnaires and interviews will be piloted with a small reference group. Members of the reference group will also take part in a second round of data collection process. At the conclusion of the research in January, the reference group will be asked to take part in an Expert Focus Group Discussion.

Following the pilot process, research with approximately 60 industry stakeholders will take place over the three months:

- Participants are asked to commit 12 minutes of their time to the first questionnaire, which will be sent out starting in September.
- Interviews with approximately 60 participants will be organized in September to December and take one hour at the most.
- A second interview with half the participants may take place for less than 20 minutes. Only if required, a second questionnaire would take less than 10 minutes.

This research is financed by the International Development Research Centre (IDRC - a Canadian federal Crown corporation that funds research in developing countries), and the Fonds de Recherche du Québec Société et Culture (FRSCQ – the province of Quebec's public granting agency for academic research). This research complies with expectations of the ethical conduct of research. Project File # S-02-21-5106.

This research is conducted by the School of International Development and Global Studies at the University of Ottawa in Canada. It is conducted in affiliation with the Gujarat Institute of Development Research (GIDR) in Ahmedabad and with collaboration from Glocal Research in Hyderabad. Local research assistants in Gujarat and Telangana will assist with the data collection.

As a participant in this research project, the principal investigator assures:

- That you can ask the researcher any question about any part of the research being conducted.
- You have the right to refuse to participate in this project, and to refuse to answer any questions in the questionnaire or interviews.
- Your comments will remain anonymous so that neither you (nor your organization) will be identified, unless you explicitly consent to be cited. In other words, any publication resulting from this study will not identify you by name or include any information that you may permit you to be identified, unless you have agreed to be identified.
- You may withdraw your participation in the research project (questionnaire, interviews) at any time, and can instruct the researcher (using contact information below) to destroy all information gathered from you in the course of the research (questionnaire, interviews) prior to publication of the results of the study.
